VI. Between Fragility and Resilience: and Explanation of Human, Social, Natural, Physical, and Financial Capitals in the South of Iraq

This brief highlights that the fragility and resilience of the state reflects the role of civil society, safety nets, and the resources available to the citizens.

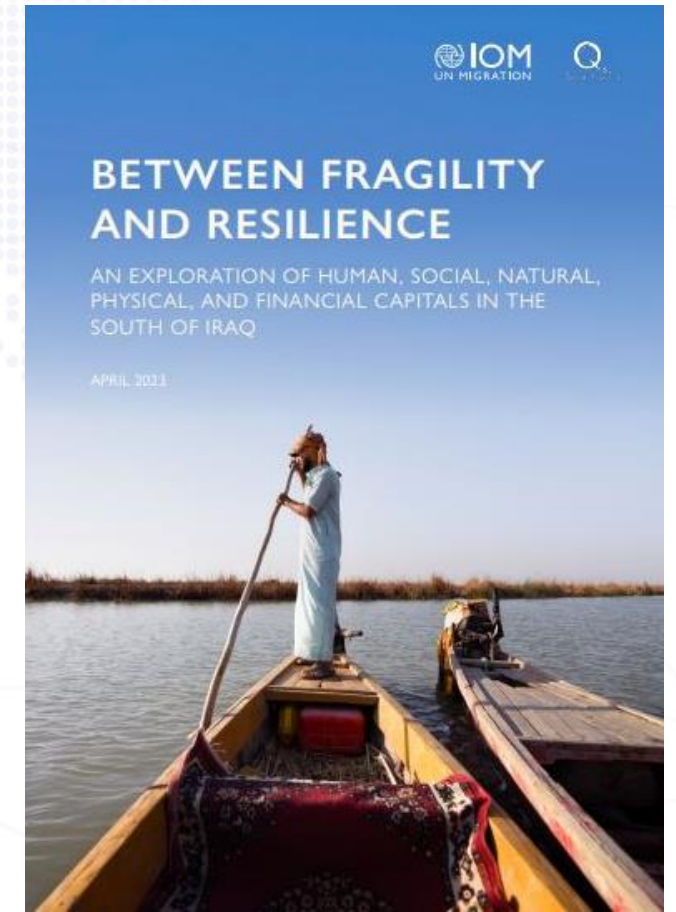

It also discusses the capacity of the state to make citizens less vulnerable to violence, by providing services and by mediating relationships both between citizens and between the citizens and the state.

It explains the factors which affect individual and collective resilience and fragility through different capitals:

Human, social, natural, physical, and financial capitals.
